Academic
What comes to mind when you think of medieval Europe? The Crusades and religious wars? Inquisitors and monks? The Black Death? This coming semester in HSTV 405, you can explore conceptions of these and other topics in an "Issues in the History of Medieval Europe" course. Each week, you will evaluate popular representations and traditional understandings of themes, events, and institutions that are seen as characteristic of medieval Europe (such as feudalism, the medieval Church, and the topics mentioned above) in light of primary sources and recent historical research. Through discussion, primary source analysis, and your own research, you will assess which elements of common understandings of medieval Europe hold up under the scrutiny of your analysis and which don't. In so doing, you will gain an appreciation for and engage in the debates that shape the study of the history of medieval Europe today.

David Y. Neufeld is a Ph.D. candidate in History at the Division for Late Medieval and Reformation Studies, University of Arizona. His doctoral research focuses on the survival of Swiss Anabaptist religious radicals and their conflicts with political authorities in early modern Switzerland.
